There's a new layer to the digital media industry, and it's leading to a serious change for the creative talent that drives its ability to monetize its content. That "talent" is not the employees of a publishing house or a brand but the content creators themselves — the artists, writers, photographers, graphic designers, and performers themselves — and they're moving away from the traditional employment relationships more and more. If that sounds familiar, it should: This is a kind of creative exodus that has come to characterize the publishing industry for many decades, but in a digital-powered economy, it feels more "mutual" and mutually beneficial — or at least that's the impression I got at the ongoing Creative Intelligence

Conference in New York. The days of being an employee seem to be numbered. Just from anecdotal evidence, the creative people I know at brands are frequently more excited about the opportunity to create and express themselves than about the need to be reprimanded, or even cajoled, to do so. “It’s fun,” says a PR executive who has worked with a lot of the creatives I’ve talked to lately. “I’m not going to be the boss any more, and I don’t want to be.” And in fact, here is the challenge. The creative people who are leaving employers are often leaving because they’re no longer being paid what they’re worth to the organization, and it’s not a simple matter of bargaining for a better deal. It’s just not enough to “talk about the value” of their work. In an era when what they do is commoditized and their credentials are commoditized, they need to be valued as the repositories of that value. They need to be “monetized” by creating content that 570a42141b
