In this study, the spatial distribution of microbial community, as well as its response to long-term Cd contamination, was investigated in the field. The functional genes involved in immobilization of heavy metal (HM) were also determined. Fungal abundance (110,000+/-27,000 microg(-1) soil) was significantly higher in P1 (upstream) soil, which is influenced by rapid industrial development. Functional genes related to HM-removal (hmrA, methH, merA) were significantly higher in P1. Gene abundance in microbial populations remained more or less constant when sites were sampled at the same depth in adjacent soil. Phosphate solubilization capacity was higher in P1, although bacterial abundance was not different between the two soil samples. The immobilization of Cd decreased in the order, P1>P2>P3>P4. The significant difference in HM-removal ability of soil samples could be explained by the different fungal and bacterial abundance. The net effect of Cd immobilization was close to zero in the upper layer, suggesting that the immobilization of Cd
