The Adobe family is a subset of the OpenType family, which is a superset of the PostScript family. It inherits the standard names from the PostScript family, including the programming language name, Language_Name. Programming language names are inherited from the PostScript family to the programming language names, from the programming language names to the family names, from the family names to the font names, and from the font names to the font names. The programming language names are used to specify the correct language for the file, but the family name and font name names are used to refer to the font program and to the PostScript font file, respectively. Thus, the Adobe family name and the programming language name work together to convey the following information: Adobe found a font in the WordPerfect 10 family named Language_Name. It has the programming language name specified. The font may be a version of the font program specified with the same programming language name in another family (not the OpenType family), and the font file may be a version of a font file specified in a font program specified in another family (not the PostScript family). The file extension should not be used as a determination of family or font name. The only determinative parts of the name are the family name and the programming language name.
