The new post-doctoral residential curriculum described in this proposal addresses the need for training fellows for the burgeoning field of molecular genetics in New York City. The proposed program can be seamlessly integrated into the Columbia University (CU) post-doctoral training environment, which has extensive training programs in the field of molecular genetics. The program will help alleviate the significant shortage of qualified scientists in the area of molecular genetics, so that it is possible to develop a cohort of future leaders who have the skills needed to become independent investigators in the field. Currently, there are many faculty positions with research programs in molecular genetics in the city. However, there is a significant shortage of trained scientists to carry out the research. The proposed program will have an intellectual home in the Division of Molecular and Experimental Medicine (MED), a Department with broad and deep expertise in the field of molecular genetics. The proposed program is supported by an outstanding program committee that has assembled a superb group of faculty with expertise in modern biomedical research, to ensure the success of this unique training program. This program is made up of two parts, including a formal post-doctoral program and an informal learning environment that is designed for both existing and new post-doctoral fellows. The first part of the program consists of 18 month training period during which fellows would participate in a didactic program that includes various classes, a weekly course, and a daily journal club. A weekly, in-person meeting between the program committee and the fellow to discuss his/her research is also mandatory for all the fellows. During the training period, fellows would work under the guidance of a faculty mentor. Fellows are also required to attend a series of seminars in the academic year and a weekly conference where they can present their research to their peers. The second part consists of an information exchange with the mentors. This information exchange will involve the best available published materials in the field, as well as knowledge transfer from students of the mentors to the mentors and the mentees. The program will be supervised by Dr. David Adams, a molecular geneticist who is highly regarded in the field of molecular genetics and computational biology. Dr. David Adams has a long-standing track record in the field of computational biology and a strong program that has served as a training site for many scientists. The mentoring team includes three senior faculty members with strong track records in training post-doctoral scientists in the field of molecular genetics. These faculty members also have outstanding research programs, including strong backgrounds in data analysis and computational biology.Saint-Germain-de-Mecher

Q: ASP.NET Core 2.1 how to use database First or Migrations First I have ASP.NET Core 2.1, I don't want to use the database First or Migrations First. I only want to use code first approach. Currently, I am working on an ASP.NET Core 2.1 project, I used to follow Migrations first approach as this is not a web application. I always encountered problems while updating the migration files. So, I am not so sure about this approach. Please advise. A: From what I understand, from your question, you don't want to use Migrations because you're using an "old" application. You are asking about code first approach because "currently, I am working on an ASP.NET Core 2.1 project". The SQL server database approach is actually a plugin of ASP.NET Core that allows you to create and work on your database. Code-first approach is used when we start building our applications. With it, you generate the entire database schema and you can choose to use migrations as well. Migrations first approach is a way of automatically generating your database schema based on the Entity Framework migrations (that were previously generated). You could have a more up to date database schema in a short amount of time and you are free from using migrations. Of course, when we decide to change our database schema, we could always use the Migrations approach. Try to use the Entity Framework to work with your database by creating entities, and saving your information. It also requires you to work with the ApplicationDbContext. You may use it as a class file, in a separate file.
