ANGELES—Pushing back from the edges of the dark, the dead silence of this moonlit night was pierced by the sound of a motorcycle striking metal. Its rumbles could be heard from a quarter-mile away. This motorcycle was of the kind that can often be heard at night in Southern California—a Harley. The rider’s gear: a black helmet with the familiar logo, sunglasses, and plaid jacket. The young man sitting on the bike’s wide chrome fender at the quiet end of the apartment block's cracked cement walkway fit the image. But he would have had to have grown up amid Southern California's media-rich social fabric to think of himself as a biker. The real biker, the one that brought other bikers' faces back to mind, was sitting on the balcony of Nick Stone's apartment,
