The Bolivian military has destroyed the famous Tiahuanaco Temple, also known as the Lost City of the Incas, in the Chapare region. The site is the result of an important archaeological work that goes back to the 1960s. But for the Bolivian government, the construction of the Tiahuanaco Temple was a crime of the worst sort, so the army was sent in to clean it up. The remains of Tiahuanaco were not sacred; they were simply the result of anthropologists studying the ancient structure. The ancient site was initially supposed to be studied by archaeologist Walter Alva, but his research never got off the ground. Following the death of Alva, human rights groups teamed up with archaeologists to get the government to declare the site off limits. They then funded an archaeological mission of their own, which uncovered and excavated numerous ancient relics there. Today, the government remains in full denial. U.N. Special Rapporteur on indigenous rights Victoria Tauli-Corpuz is outraged that archeologists have been systematically barred from accessing the site of the ruins. The Bolivian government has yet to comply with a 2012 ruling by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ordering Bolivian officials to cease enforcing a national ban on archeological exploration at Tiahuanaco. "As the Government's destruction demonstrates, Bolivia's continuing adherence to such an unjust ban on scientific research and exploitation of Bolivia's human and natural heritage continues to place it at odds with international standards," she said. The site, located 1,500 miles south of Bolivia's capital, is home to the ruins of the area's largest settlement, which dates back to approximately 1,500 BC. Peru responded to the destruction by issuing an international warrant for the arrest of Bolivian military officer Armando Alcala, who was in charge of the operation. Once again, Bolivia is in full denial. *** Follow me on Twitter: @aravosis Like me on Facebook: @dward619Alex
