There are many aspects to HyperMotion Technology, from the way it's used in control of the ball – in player mode – to the way its applied on the pitch. We've got our hands on FIFA 20's controls for the first time, as well as an in-depth look at the new game's engine – FIFA 20 Engine. FIFA 20 HyperMotion Technology in-game systems iDTech Motion Markers iDTech Motion Markers are a core part of FIFA 20's controls. They're small square-shaped markers, which you can find in the bottom right-hand corner of the screen, or you can add them to your HUD. iDTech markers are used for a number of functions, including: Measuring the speed of the ball – by using iDTech Motion Markers, ball speed is measured in real-time on the pitch, which changes depending on the speed of the player. Capturing Player Motions – By using iDTech Motion Markers, players can be mapped onto the screen for the purposes of capturing their movements and tackling animations, for example. Player markers are not used in real-time, but simply for tracking the player's movements when they aren't actually in view. Linking Multiple Players in-game – Using iDTech Motion Markers, multiple players can be connected together, and this allows you to create teams of up to five players. Animation and physics settings Settings that impact on the way a particular animation is played out, or how the physics of the game are impacted, can be found under Player > Animation and Player > Physics. The ball will affect the game's physics in FIFA 20, allowing players and objects in the game to be pushed and pulled by different players. The intensity of the physics can be set via the following settings: Ball Radial Acceleration This setting affects how much a player can pull the ball along the pitch. A lower setting (higher sensitivity) means the ball is harder to control. Ball Rotational Acceleration The amount a player can accelerate the ball around the pitch. A lower setting (higher sensitivity) means the ball is harder to control. Ground Reaction Force This setting affects how many forces the game's engine is programmed to apply to the player when they jump or change direction. A

FIFA is the world's most popular and authentic football experience. Developed in FIFA's storied heritage, FIFA 22 marks the best-selling franchise as of October 2018, with over 235 million gamers having played the title worldwide. Last year FIFA earned 46 Game of the Year nominations and was named the best sports game by almost all gaming media outlets. FIFA 22 continues this legacy of delivering the most authentic football experience to fans around the world while also innovating in areas such as physical gameplay and engaging visuals. We've been anticipating FIFA 22 since its announcement at EA Play and can't wait to take a new look at what EA's done to FIFA for the newest edition. First and foremost, the game's new presentation is something of a visual feast with upgraded textures on every player, kits, stadiums, and ball physics. Following that visual upgrade, it's what's underneath the surface that makes the game groundbreaking. Physically based gameplay delivers intelligent goalkeeper reactions, as well as how a defender can approach the ball during a tackle. Goalkeepers can perform diving saves, accurate under-foot touches, and other new maneuvers, while defenders can push, slide, tackle, and charge with enhanced animations and smarter decision-making with how they position themselves to make a choice to win a loose ball or prevent a goal. Rounding out this visual upgrade is upgraded player 3D models, on-field animations, improved goal celebration cuts, and new player celebrations that aren't just a simple punch. Below is a rundown of the key additions and new features in FIFA 22 and how they are designed to improve the overall experience of the game and create a more complete and authentic football experience: Physics is an intrinsic part of the game, but FIFA hasn't had the ability to control the player's physical attributes in the past as they have with the visual upgrades like player maturation and refereeing. FIFA 22 brings a completely new SimCity-like build inside of the player to give developers full control to control and affect how each player moves during play. This adds increased player intelligence at both ends of the field. Virtually every stat that impacts the game is now programmable using the new iFit technology. This allows the developers to have a more granular and informed view of all the data that is being tracked in the game and how each player is changing. It's truly a level of granularity and a new level of feedback
