Multiplayer, SkidRow, how to activate Assassin's Creed 2 Remastered., UbisoftLast night a fairly large, heavy rain storm hit Charleston, SC. I walked outside and at about 9:00pm noticed a storm front had moved in, the sky was very dark and I felt a small breeze. However, the rain was still light at that time. As soon as it started, the rain got heavier. It was very difficult to drive back to my apartment (about a 30 minute walk) due to the heavy rain, traffic on King St. and uneven surface conditions on West Ashley Ave. Although I managed to make it to my apartment safely (and about a 12 minute walk), I was clearly a bit disappointed that the storms didn't have any big wind or significant lightning that would come with it. The Charleston weather has really toughened over the years with the hurricanes, and given its location and proximity to the Atlantic Ocean, it's no surprise that the area gets occasional severe weather. However, a few storms in a year doesn't really seem like a lot (I'm talking about storm systems) when you consider how frequently it rains in Charleston. There's also a lot of stress put on the city with the yearly storm events like this. The streets, the ferries, the stormwater tunnels, the wind turbines, all the infrastructure, etc. You'd think that a larger city like Boston would be able to deal with a severe storm like this but it gets somewhat of a pass due to the fact that the attention is
